In chapter 14 of this book, I noticed that it mentioned all three of the topics that we have covered. The chapter really explains the differences between distributism and Marxism. It brings up a good point that Marxism and distributism, both, do not agree with capitalism, but they disagree in different ways. One example that is used, would be that Marxist think that capitalism has too many people who have private productive property, while distributism think that there should be more privately owned production properties. This chapter also mentions that Marxism focuses on the social class ranking, while distributism focuses on the religious aspect. It seems as if distributism would be a step in the right direction that society should take. It is mentioned in this chapter, that this would be one of the more peaceful and slow transitions that society could choose.

While reading part five of this book, I noticed that it was about the mindset that people have about capitalism. It mentions how capitalism is very degrading to labor. People are pushed into jobs that are meaningless, and do not benefit them in anyway other than the money that they earn. Nobody really focuses on being happy in life, or appreciating the things that they do have. People are always pushing themselves to earn more money, so that they can buy the hot new thing. This chapter focuses on trying to understand this problem and how to separate it from society. Once people can understand how degrading labor is in capitalism, then they can try and figure out a solution.

In chapter fourteen of this book, even though it is about socialism, it explains why socialism isn't in the United States. This chapter explains why the United States favors capitalism. The reason that the United States prefers capitalism, is mainly because of the rewards that people get when it comes to capitalism. If all of the benefits are better with capitalism, then of course capitalism would be the that people will pick. Another reason mentioned, that capitalism is so strong in the United States, would be because it has been successful, and capitalism has everything that it needs to thrive in the United States. It has the desire from the people, and it has the resources to keep going, and technology has evolved, and promoted capitalism.
